Tourism is a global event that has taken the world into a storm, defining travel meant for leisure or business. Tourism has witnessed a rapid growth, both in developed and newly emerging economies. And the answer lies in the advancement of the current new age society. Look back at the time when you took your last vacation. How did you commute to the location? Did you drive, or took public transportation? Regardless, you arrived at your destination through some means of transportation.

Transportation is a critical facet of the tourism industry powering people to travel to various destinations. It's a new world and travellers are diligent to opt for a better commute option regardless of the price and distance. The entire tourism industry is dependent on transportation. Moreover, many industries and colonies are dependent upon transportation contributing a major part towards the tourism industry.

A bistro in Manali will not be able to hold on to its business if there would be no transport system connecting it with potential customers. Tourists have various options for transportation like trains, automobiles, ships and trains. Or in many cases a combination thereof. In other words, to survive in the market tourism and transportation needs to be interdependent on each other.

Modern Bus Advancement and Indian Tourism

India is vast terrain! It's a 2000 mile journey from the tip of northern Ladakh to the south of Tamil Nadu, and a 1822 mile journey from the west of Gujarat to the Northeastern end of Manipur, creating a challenge for the masses to commute inter & intracity. Luckily, we got different modes of commute system bridging the gap between states.

Buses play a major part in the tourism industry. Tour buses around the world allow tourists to view local attractions or scenery. These are often open-top buses, but can also be regular buses or coaches.

In local sightseeing, City Sightseeing is the largest operator of local tour buses, operating on a franchised basis all over the world. Specialist tour buses are also often owned and operated by safari parks and other theme parks or resorts. Longer-distance tours are also carried out by bus, either on a turn up and go basis or through a tour operator, and usually allow disembarkation from the bus to allow touring of sites of interest on foot. These may be day trips or longer excursions incorporating hotel stays. Tour buses often carry a tour guide, although the driver or a recorded audio commentary may also perform this function. The tour operator may be a subsidiary of a company that operates buses and coaches for other uses or an independent company that charts buses or coaches. Commuter transport operators may also use their coaches to conduct tours within the target city between the morning and evening commuter transport journey.
